

ISSN 1936-5349 (print)
ISSN 1936-5357 (online)

HARVARD

JOHN M. OLIN CENTER FOR LAW, ECONOMICS, AND BUSINESS

CORPORATE POWER IS CORPORATE PURPOSE II:
AN ENCOURAGEMENT FOR FUTURE CONSIDERATION FROM PROFESSORS JOHNSON AND MILLON

Leo E. Strine, Jr.

Forthcoming in Washington and Lee Law Review

Discussion Paper No. 896

01/2017

Harvard Law School
Cambridge, MA 02138

This paper can be downloaded without charge from:

The Harvard John M. Olin Discussion Paper Series:
http://www.law.harvard.edu/programs/olin\_center

The Social Science Research Network Electronic Paper Collection:
<https://ssrn.com/abstract=2906787>

This paper is also Discussion Paper 2017-2 of the Harvard Law School Program on Corporate Governance

University of Pennsylvania Law School

ILE

INSTITUTE FOR LAW AND ECONOMICS

A Joint Research Center of the Law School, the Wharton School, and the Department of Economics in the School of Arts and Sciences at the University of Pennsylvania

---

RESEARCH PAPER NO. 16-35

Corporate Power is Corporate Purpose II:
An Encouragement for Future Consideration from Professors Johnson and Millon

Leo E. Strine, Jr.

GOVERNMENT OF THE STATE OF DELAWARE - SUPREME COURT OF DELAWARE; HARVARD LAW SCHOOL; UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA LAW SCHOOL

This paper can be downloaded without charge from the Social Science Research Network Electronic Paper Collection:
<https://ssrn.com/abstract=2906787>

Corporate Power is Corporate Purpose II: An Encouragement For Future Consideration From Professors Johnson and Millon

By

Leo E. Strine, Jr.* †

Washington and Lee Law Review

Draft of October 14, 2016
Please do not cite.

---

* Chief Justice, Delaware Supreme Court; Adjunct Professor of Law, University of Pennsylvania Law School; Austin Wakeman Scott Lecturer in Law, Harvard Law School; Senior Fellow, Harvard Program on Corporate Governance; and Henry Crown Fellow, Aspen Institute.

† The author is grateful to Christine Balaguer, Peter Fritz, Alexandra Joyce, Fay Krewer, and Peggy Pfeiffer for their assistance. The author also thanks Rick Geisenberger.

I am honored to participate in this special symposium for two scholars I have long admired. That the work of Lyman Johnson and David Millon should be honored together is fitting, because although each is unique in important ways, what their scholarship shares is far more critical. That shared core is a deep concern for how corporations and their conduct affect humanity. Unlike so many who call themselves corporate law experts, Professors Johnson and Millon never forget that corporate law was created by and for flesh-and-blood human beings, having the full range of interests that come with being human.

Thus, when they examine issues of corporate law, they are drawn to its larger implications and not the of the moment, micro-issues that draw attention from those modeling the effects of termination fees, matching rights, or the like in merger agreements. This is not to say that those sort of studies have no utility, but it is to say that what they seek to study is decidedly not what is most important about the effect corporate law and conduct has on human beings, even if one is simply looking at those issues from the narrow perspective of what produces the most wealth for stockholders themselves.

Another word besides humanity comes to mind when one thinks of Professors Johnson and Millon and that is conscience. They never yield from the view that no one occupying a position of trust and authority over an organization that affects the many may escape the responsibility to apply one's conscience—one's sense of right and wrong—when deciding how to manage the organization.<sup>1</sup> For Professors Johnson and Millon, there is no rationalizing one's way out of making sure every action taken meets the mirror test of being ethical and not involving imposing unfair harm on others, in order to seek gain for the organization and its owners.

And holding that view, Professors Johnson and Millon have unsurprisingly taken the position that corporations “ought” have no duty, within the limits of their legal discretion, to make the best interests of their stockholders the end of corporate governance, with other constituencies only being instruments that can be considered when that is useful to stockholders.<sup>2</sup> Even further, they argue that their view of the “ought” is and that corporations have no duty, even under Delaware

---

<sup>1</sup> E.g., David Millon, The Ambiguous Significance of Corporate Personhood, 2 STAN. AGORA 39, 56–58 (2001); David Millon, The Single Constituency Argument in the Economic Analysis of Business Law, 24 RES. L. & ECON.: L. POL'Y 43, 53–55, 57–58 (2009). See generally Lyman Johnson, Faith and Faithfulness in Corporate Theory, 56 CATH. U. L. REV. 1 (2006); Lyman Johnson, Law and Legal Theory in the History of Corporate Responsibility: Corporate Personhood, 35 SEATTLE U. L. REV. 1135 (2012); David Millon, Enlightened Shareholder Value, Social Responsibility and the Redefinition of Corporate Purpose Without Law (Wash. & Lee Legal Studies Working Paper No. 2010-11, 2010), [<http://ssrn.com/abstract=1625750>].

<sup>2</sup> E.g., Lyman Johnson, Relating Fiduciary Duties to Corporate Personhood and Corporate Purpose, in RESEARCH HANDBOOK ON FIDUCIARY LAW, 10–17 (forthcoming 2016), [<http://ssrn.com/abstract=2814231>] [hereinafter Johnson, Relating Fiduciary Duties]; Lyman Johnson, Unsettledness in Delaware Corporate Law: Business Judgment Rule, Corporate Purpose, 38 DEL. J. CORP. L. 405, 432–38 (2013); Lyman Johnson, Pluralism in Corporate Form: Corporate Law and Benefit Corps., 25 REGENT U. L. REV. 269, 273–78 (2012); Lyman Johnson & David Millon, Corporate Law After Hobby Lobby, 70 BUS. LAW. 1, 10–15 (2015). See generally, David Millon, Radical Shareholder Primacy, 10 U. ST. THOMAS L.J. 1013 (2013).

law or other statutes that give only stockholders enforceable rights, to make stockholder welfare the end of corporate law.<sup>3</sup>

It comes as no secret that I passionately agree with my friends about the “ought” but do not agree with them about the “is.”<sup>4</sup> And I have been open that I fear that claiming that the “is” reflects the “ought” will impede the work that needs

---

<sup>3</sup> E.g., Johnson & Millon, supra note 2 at 13-14. They observe:

[W]e see Delaware as providing expressly for broad freedom of choice as to corporate purpose. Those who form a corporation are free to specify particular purposes in the organizational documents, subject only to the requirement that those purposes be ‘lawful,’ or they can leave the matter open-ended, stating simply that ‘the purpose of the corporation is to engage in any lawful act or activity.’ In the latter case, it will be up to the board of directors, exercising its statutory responsibility to direct the corporation’s “business and affairs,” to determine questions of corporate purpose.

Id.

See also e.g. Johnson, Relating Fiduciary Duties, supra note 2 at 17:

Delaware itself lacks Supreme Court precedent mandating shareholder wealth maximization and its law is agnostic and broadly permissive. A shareholder wealth maximization goal, to be sure, is a permissible objective, and likely it is the predominant one given prevailing business and professional education norms. But the pursuit of other corporate purposes is both possible and common, and results in a more humane and pluralistic business culture.

Id.

David Millon, Two Models of Corporate Social Responsibility, 46 WAKE FOREST L. REV. 523, 526 (2011) (“Delaware law is not committed to shareholder primacy. Management’s duties are owed to ‘the corporation and its stockholders,’ rather than to the shareholders alone.”).

<sup>4</sup> See e.g., Leo E. Strine, Jr., The Dangers of Denial: The Need for a Clear-Eyed Understanding of the Power and Accountability Structure Established by the Delaware General Corporation Law, 50 WAKE FOREST L. REV. 761, 768–86 (2015) [hereinafter Strine, The Dangers of Denial]; Leo E. Strine Jr., Our Continuing Struggle with the Idea That For-Profit Corporations Seek Profit, 47 WAKE FOREST L. REV. 135 (2012) [hereinafter Strine, Our Continuing Struggle]; Leo E. Strine, Jr. & Nicholas Walter, Conservative Collision Course?: The Tension Between Conservative Corporate Law Theory And Citizens United, 100 CORNELL L. REV. 335, 389–90 (2015).

to be done to make sure that corporations conduct their affairs in the way that is most productive for societies.<sup>5</sup>

In this short essay, I do not wish to challenge my friends on this point, but to encourage them to push their scholarship further by considering the following perspective on their work, a perspective that emphasizes my primary point, which is that corporate power is corporate purpose.

In their writings, Professors Johnson and Millon often highlight examples of for-profit corporations that do not seek to maximize stockholder wealth, as an argument that shows that corporate managers do not have to put the best interests of stockholders first. But, their examples are telling. They cite situations when the corporate electorate is controlled by a singular interest, and that interest has goals it wishes to maximize more than returns. To wit, they take great heart in Hobby Lobby, a corporations controlled by a family with very specific religious views.<sup>6</sup> Likewise, Professor Johnson points to Chick-fil-A,<sup>7</sup> a privately held, family owned company influenced by its founder's religious beliefs and which closes on Sundays, consistent with its corporate purpose "[t]o glorify God by being a faithful

---

<sup>5</sup> See e.g., Strine, The Dangers of Denial, supra at 786–93; Leo E. Strine, Jr., A Job Is Not a Hobby: The Judicial Revival of Corporate Paternalism and Its Problematic Implications, 41 J. CORP. L. 71, 107–14 (2015) [hereinafter Strine, A Job Is Not a Hobby]; Strine, Our Continuing Struggle, supra at 167–72; Strine & Walter, supra at 389-90.

<sup>6</sup> See generally Johnson & Millon, supra note 2.

<sup>7</sup> See Johnson, Unsettledness in Delaware Corporate Law, supra note 2 at 446–47.

steward of all that is entrusted to us and to have a positive influence on all who come into contact with Chick-fil-A.”<sup>8</sup>

But notice what this means. It does not mean that the corporation is operating in a manner that is fair to all corporate constituencies other than stockholders, or that provides them with any protections. In fact, Hobby Lobby itself won a case that involved its controlling stockholders, using their own conscience, denying Hobby Lobby’s 13,000 full-time workers the ability to use a personal benefit that comes to them with employment under secular laws.<sup>9</sup> Nothing about Hobby Lobby suggests that the corporate board had a distinct obligation to think about other constituencies for itself and to be fair to them. Instead, the U.S Supreme Court issued a cursory decision conflating Hobby Lobby with those who controlled a majority of its equity—its stock.<sup>10</sup> This was not, to me convincing, corporate or constitutional law.<sup>11</sup> But, the inarguable point is that whatever Hobby Lobby as an entity was doing involved making the interests of its controlling stockholders the end of governance, not the best interests of all corporate constituencies. And it is no more of a comfort for those other constituencies when a controlling stockholder maximizes its idiosyncratic <sup>8</sup> Company Information, CHICK-FIL-A, <http://www.chick-fil-a.com/Company/Responsibility-Giving-Tradition> (last visited Oct. 12, 2016).

---

<sup>9</sup> Burwell v. Hobby Lobby Stores, Inc., 134 S. Ct. 2751, 2765 (2014).

<sup>10</sup> Hobby Lobby, 134 S. Ct. 2751 (2014).

<sup>11</sup> See generally Strine, A Job Is Not a Hobby, supra note 5.

preferences than when a public company with a diverse base of stockholders puts the best interests of its stockholders first.

Put differently, Hobby Lobby illustrates why public companies in fact must put the interests of their equity holders first. In the case of a controlled company like Hobby Lobby, the board of Hobby Lobby—which runs an entity distinct from the Green family<sup>12</sup>—follows the drum beat of those who elect it. In the case of a public company, the power dynamics are identical. But, what is different is that unlike the Green family, the investor bases of diverse public companies only have one real thing in common: they hope to profit from their investment in the company. These investors most likely have very diverse views about things like how to treat workers, how much to protect the environment, and religion. As things now stand, the direct investors in public companies will not be humans, they will typically be mutual or pension funds, with no mandate to make political, religious, and value judgments for their investors.<sup>13</sup>

To me, these realities mean that if the “ought” Professors Johnson and Millon desire is to become something more like reality, changes must be made to the power dynamics under which all corporations operate. That might mean changes within corporate statutory law to require, not permit, the consideration of other constituencies, and to put some teeth behind that idea. That might mean changes to the obligations of institutional investors to consider the full range of their human investors' interests, including their interest in a sustainable, responsible system of wealth creation. That might mean enhanced externality protections for workers, consumers, communities in which the corporation operates, and the environment. That might mean limiting the ability of corporations to use other people's money in a way that compromises our political system.

---

<sup>12</sup> The Green family owns and operates Hobby Lobby. Hobby Lobby, 134 S. Ct. at 2765.

<sup>13</sup> See Marshall E. Blume and Donald B. Keim, The Changing Preferences of Institutional Investors for Common Stocks 4 (2014), <http://ssrn.com/abstract=2416900> (noting that in 2010, institutional investors owned 67% of all U.S. public stock).

For present purposes, less important is the precise how, more important is the what. And the what must involve the power dynamics that act on corporate boards. If the only power within the corporate polity is wielded by equity capital, then the ends of governance will maximize equity's preferences. I do not find it comforting that the Green family, however well intentioned, can use their stockholder power to impose their own religious views on Hobby Lobby's workers and deny 13,000 full-time workers<sup>14</sup>—who need to feed their families—access to health care options that society has said they should have. Nor do I find it comforting that for-profit corporate boards have been unleashed to spend funds in the political process, when there is no principled basis to believe that investors bought stock for expressive purposes and when actual experience—the failure of corporate PACs to be able to raise stockholder funds even though permitted to do so for many years<sup>15</sup>—demonstrates that proposition is false.

---

<sup>14</sup> Hobby Lobby, 134 S. Ct. at 2765.

Like Adolf Berle,<sup>16</sup> I like the economically powerful to have legally enforceable duties to be socially responsible. In the case of corporations, that means we must do the hard work of not only making corporate boards accountable for treating all corporate constituencies with respect and integrity, but also making corporate stockholders who control corporations do so. And in today's world,

---

<sup>15</sup> Citizens United was decided in part on the ground that corporations are vehicles for expression by the stockholders. But, federal law allowed corporations to use corporate funds to raise money from stockholders for their corporate PACs. 2 U.S.C. § 441b(b)(2) (2006) (defining “contribution” to exclude contributions to “separate segregated fund[s]” established by corporations, i.e., PACs); see also 11 C.F.R. § 114.2 (2009) (setting out regulations for contributions by corporations, and by and to their PACs). Precisely because stockholders did not buy stock for expressive purposes, this truly voluntary approach did not generate stockholder contributions.

<sup>16</sup> See Adolf A. Berle Jr., For Whom Corporate Managers are Trustees: A Note, 45 HARV. L. REV. 1365 (1932). Berle argued that if managers were allowed to consider the interests of constituencies other than stockholders, there would need to be a regulatory system to hold the managers accountable:

Now I submit that you can not abandon emphasis on ‘the view that business corporations exist for the sole purpose of making profits for their stockholders’ until such time as you are prepared to offer a clear and reasonably enforceable scheme of responsibilities to someone else. . . . Either you have a system based on individual ownership of property or you do not. If not—and there are at the moment plenty of reasons why capitalism does not seem ideal—it becomes necessary to present a system (none has been presented) of law or government, or both, by which responsibility for control of national wealth and income is so apportioned and enforced that the community as a whole, or at least the great bulk of it, is properly taken care of. Otherwise the economic power now mobilized and massed under the corporate form, in the hands of a few thousand directors, and the few hundred individuals holding ‘control,’ is simply handed over, weakly, to the present administrators with a pious wish that something nice will come out of it all.

Id. at 1367–68.

most Americans are stockholders not of actual corporations that make products and deliver services, but of mutual funds and other intermediaries through their 401(k) retirement plans.<sup>17</sup> Any increase in the social responsibility of corporations will therefore depend importantly on what obligations institutional investors owe themselves.

As they continue to seek to increase other-regarding approaches to corporate management, I urge my friends to concentrate their lively minds on the ultimate issue of power. Without addressing the power structure to which corporate managers are accountable, the “ought” Professors Johnson and Millon want cannot become reality.

It remains a matter of debate whether, as a positive matter, the boards of directors of public companies in the United States must make stockholder welfare the end of corporate governance.<sup>18</sup> For some commentators, even the directors of Delaware corporations may govern the firm on a multi-constituency model, where <sup>17</sup> John Bogle said in a 2009 speech that: “In our old ownership society 92 percent of all stocks were owned by individuals and 8 percent by institutions. But in today’s agency society, only 24 percent of stocks are owned by individuals, with the remaining 76 percent held by institutions.” Speech, John C. Bogle, Building a Fiduciary Society, IA Compliance Summit (March 13, 2009), https://www.vanguard.com/bogle\_site/sp20090313.html (emphasis in original). As of June 2014, 401(k) plans held $4.8 trillion in assets on behalf of 52 million active participants, and 64% of these assets were invested in mutual funds. Frequently Asked Questions About 401(k) Plans, INVESTMENT COMPANY INSTITUTE, https://www.ici.org/policy/retirement/plan/401k/faqs\_401k.

---

<sup>18</sup> See e.g., Johnson, Relating Fiduciary Duties, supra note 2 at 1 (noting that “corporate purpose remains an unsettled topic evoking fierce debate”).

the stockholders are just one of many corporate constituencies, any one of which may be considered not just a means, but an end of corporate management.<sup>19</sup> They argue this despite the reality that the Delaware General Corporation Law gives only stockholders rights, such as the right to elect directors,<sup>20</sup> vote on major transactions,<sup>21</sup> and enforce fiduciary duties.<sup>22</sup> They argue that legions of Delaware judges have just gotten their own law wrong.<sup>23</sup>

---

<sup>19</sup> See e.g., Lynn Stout, THE SHAREHOLDER VALUE MYTH, HOW PUTTING SHAREHOLDERS FIRST HARMS INVESTORS, CORPORATIONS, AND THE PUBLIC 95–115 (2012) (arguing that boards may consider stockholders as just one of several constituencies and interests whose best interests may be an end of corporate governance); Margaret M. Blair & Lynn A. Stout, A Team Production Theory of Corporate Law, 85 VA. L. REV. 247, 288 (1999):

Corporate law does not treat directors as shareholders’ agents but as something quite different: independent hierarchs who are charged not with serving shareholders’ interests alone, but with serving the interests of the legal entity known as the “corporation.” The interests of the corporation, in turn, can be understood as a joint welfare function of all the individuals who make firm-specific investments and agree to participate in the extracontractual, internal mediation process within the firm.”

Id.

<sup>20</sup> Del. Code Ann. Tit. 8, § 211(b) (2016) (establishing stockholder right to elect directors).

<sup>21</sup> Id. § 251(c) (requiring stockholder vote for mergers); id. § 271 (requiring stockholder vote for sale of all or substantially all assets).

<sup>22</sup> Id. § 327 (creating stockholder right to initiate a suit on behalf of a corporation).

<sup>23</sup> See e.g., Stout supra note 19 at 30–31 (arguing that Revlon proves that “it is only when a public corporation is about to stop being a public corporation that directors lose the protection of the business judgment rule and must embrace shareholder wealth as their only goal”); Blair & Stout, supra note 19 at 308 (“Unocal squarely rejects shareholder primacy in favor of the view that the interests of the ‘corporation’ include the interests of nonshareholder constituencies.”); Einer Elhauge, Sacrificing Corporate Profits in the Public Interest, 80 N.Y.U. L. REV. 733, 849–50 (“some of the Revlon language suggests that the Delaware Supreme Court thought that normally nonshareholder interests could be considered only when rationally related to shareholder interests . . . [but] Delaware case law in fact does not make shareholder interests controlling and thus allows consideration of nonshareholder interests other than just when that happens to maximize shareholder value.”) Mohsen Manesh, Nearing 30, Is Revlon Showing Its Age? 71 WASH. & LEE L. REV. ONLINE 107, 143–44 (2014) (beyond Revlon’s narrow scope—covering only “sale or change in control” transactions—the business judgment rule affords corporate directors ample discretion to make decisions that serve the interests of non-shareholder stakeholders.).

In making these arguments, the power structure established by the corporate statute itself is slighted and seen as having no bearing on the duties owed by directors, or of the normative objective of corporate law itself. These arguments, as I have explained elsewhere,<sup>24</sup> have the quality of wish-fulfillment about them, as if saying that what one believes the law “ought” to be is in fact what it “is.” Confounding this dream world is the real world, where the realities of the power dynamics created by corporate law itself dictate the ends of corporate governance.

One phenomenon that bears on this question, but has gotten little consideration by those who wish that American corporate directors could in fact make the well being of other corporate constituencies, such as workers, consumer, or society more generally, an end of corporate governance equal to that of stockholder welfare, is the wave of corporate inversions.

It is widely known that many expenditures most critical to the well-being of actual human beings in our society are made by our government on our collective behalf. Care for the most vulnerable. Schools for children. The military and police who protect us. The regulatory agencies that help keep the environment clean, workers and consumers safe, and the markets free of fraud. The transportation systems, the public parks, the museums, the orchestras. The economic help to disabled workers, the elderly, the poor. The list could and perhaps should go on. But you get the point.

---

<sup>24</sup> See generally Strine, The Dangers of Denial, supra note 4.

If it were the case, therefore, as a positive description of the corporate governance system that we have, that corporate boards actually care about other corporate constituencies, we should not expect that corporate tax avoidance would be a high priority. Most of all, we would not expect that it would rise to such a priority level that the corporation would abandon the nation and state that chartered it in the first place in order to redomicile in another jurisdiction. That is especially the case if redomiciling did not involve a desire to go to another jurisdiction where the corporation would pay more taxes that would then go to benefit more of the corporation's constituencies, but instead redomiciling to known tax havens that seek to attract corporations by not taxing them much at all. It could not be that other-regarding corporate boards would seek to deepen a cycle of international tax arbitrage, where corporations seek to play nations off against each other, with the goal of reducing the extent to which corporations and their equity owners pay taxes, and therefore forcing governments to either look to others to make up the shortfall or to cut services to its citizens. If in fact, corporate boards were in an accountability system that was not exclusively focused on stockholder welfare, how can it be that renunciations of national identity and obligations this stark would occur?

But, in just the past four years, more than twenty American corporations redomiciled into other nations for the purpose of reducing the taxes they would pay.<sup>25</sup> These American corporations were not only incorporated in Delaware,<sup>26</sup> many were incorporated in jurisdictions that have statutes that make the interests of other constituencies a discretionary object of the board's beneficence.<sup>27</sup> But, although these states give lip service to other constituencies, their statutes give those constituencies no power.<sup>28</sup> They only give power to stockholders.

---

<sup>25</sup> Zachary Mider & Jesse Drucker, Tax Inversion, BLOOMBERG (Apr. 6, 2016), <https://www.bloomberg.com/quicktake/tax-inversion>.

<sup>26</sup> A few examples of companies that have recently redomiciled out of states with constituency statutes include the following. Mylan, which redomiciled in 2015, was a Pennsylvania corporation. Mylan Inc. Annual Report Pursuant (Form 10-K), at 1 (Apr. 30, 2015). Pennsylvania has a constituency statute, providing that directors may consider “[t]he effects of any action upon any or all groups affected by such action, including shareholders, members, employees, suppliers, customers and creditors of the corporation, and upon communities in which offices or other establishments of the corporation are located.” 15 Pa. Cons. Stat. §515 (2016). Medtronic, which redomiciled in 2015, was a Minnesota corporation. Medtronic, Inc. Annual Report (Form 10-K), at 1 (June 20, 2014). Minnesota has a statute providing that “a director may, in considering the best interests of the corporation, consider the interests of the corporation’s employees, customers, suppliers, and creditors, the economy of the state and nation, community and societal considerations.” Minn. Stat. § 302A.251 (Subd. 5) (2016). Actavis, which redomiciled in 2013, was a Nevada corporation. (Actavis, Inc. Annual Report (Form 10-K), at 1 (Feb. 2, 2013). Nevada has a statute providing that directors may consider “(a) The interests of the corporation’s employees, suppliers, creditors and customers; (b) The economy of the State and Nation; (c) The interests of the community and of society; and (d) The long-term as well as short-term interests of the corporation and its stockholders . . . .”

<sup>27</sup> See Jonathan D. Springer, Corporate Constituency Statutes: Hollow Hopes and False Fears, 1999 ANN. SURV. AM. L. 85, 124 (1999) (appendix identifying twenty-nine states with constituency statutes, including Pennsylvania, Nevada, and Minnesota); see also H. Matheson & Brent A. Olson, Shareholder Rights and Legislative Wrongs: Toward Balanced Takeover Legislation, 59 GEO. WASH. L. REV. 1425, 1540–45 (1991) (appendix summarizing constituency statutes).

<sup>28</sup> Julian Velasco, The Fundamental Rights of the Shareholder, 40 U.C. DAVIS L. REV. 407, 463–64 (2006) (noting that most constituency statutes are limited in scope, are permissive and do not require the board to give weight to outside interests, and do not give stockholders enforceable rights).

Nor is there a conscience-salving retort to this phenomenon. It is not the case that these corporations intend to give the reduced taxes they pay to charities they believe will help the poor more than the government, or to schools, or to those, like the profoundly disabled, who need life-long support. There is only one justification for this conduct, which is to have the corporation reduce the obligations it owes to society.<sup>29</sup>

Without wishing to condemn any corporation that has “inverted” itself into a citizen of a nation other than our own, I simply wish to point out the obvious. The boards of these corporations believed that the republic they were governing owed its loyalty to its only citizens, and those citizens are called stockholders. The boards of these corporations did not view themselves as having any national loyalties or loyalties to other constituencies, they viewed themselves as elected officials in the republic of equity capital.

---

<sup>29</sup> Of course, big corporations are not the only ones who talk a good game about social responsibility but take action to avoid paying taxes to the society that nurtured it. Consider in that respect, the world’s leading Dutch rock band, U2, led by social activist Bono. Mary Anastasia O’Grady, ‘Bono Needs to Pay Up,’ WALL ST. J. (June 8, 2011), <http://www.wsj.com/articles/SB10001424052702304259304576373771000025408>. And even a corporation that touts itself as a certified B Corporation committed to goals other than profit, Etsy, inverted part of its operations to a tax haven, a decision that is difficult to rationalize on any social responsibility grounds, and instead is simply a way to increase profits by cutting the corporation’s taxes. Those taxes, of course, fund social services, environmental protection, and other social goods critical to society. Suzanne Kapner, Etsy Faces Pressure to Abandon Irish Tax Strategy, WALL ST. J. (Sept. 1, 2015), <http://www.wsj.com/articles/etsy-faces-pressure-to-abandon-irish-tax-strategy-1441080008>.

If we want a world where that is not the case, then we must do the hard work of giving more power to other corporate constituencies, both within and without corporate law. Using the relative luxury of an academic, journalistic or legal position to promote the idea that the world would improve for workers, consumers, communities, and the environment if corporate boards simply realized that they could govern corporations by treating these interests as if they were equal to stockholders does nothing but impede the more difficult job of reform that must be done. The only way to make the world be more like it ought to be is to be willing to be clear-eyed about what it is.